THE CONDOR'S MANIFEST.

It was eight o'clock at night, and Mark Compton, the confidential clerk of Gaffey & Co., Commission Merchants, found himself alone in the Mark Compton could not overcome the confidence of the compton could not overcome the compton could not compton. counting-room of the firm. He felt comfortable, with his fect so near the grate, and listened to the howling November winds with a smile. The firm had retired to cosy parlors far removed from the business quarters of the river city, and the key had been turned in the front door by the clerk. He had received instructions concerning certain correspondence which had to be ready for the morning mail, hence his presence in the counting-room at the hour

With his accustomed promptitude the letters had been written, and, for rest and recreation, the clerk had hung presence was not demanded anywhere, an exclamation fell from his lips. and he did not feel like deserting a comfortable fire for the wind-swept 'The Condor is coming up," he said in an audible tone to himself; "and, by my lady's love! I forgot to look at her manifest this morning." A daily journal was within reach, and the next moment the confidential clerk was running his eye down the column of river news. Gaffey & Co., were the largest commission dealers in the city, and almost daily received consignments from the South. These consignments brought work to Mark Compton, and therefore the river col-

"I've heard of real life-mysteries, and, as this may be the only one I may ever run against, I'm going to make the most of it.' Having reached, a conclusion, the confidential clerk of Gaffey & Co., donned his overcoat, lowered the gas, and left the store. He made his way to the wharf; and inquired at the steamship office if the Condor had arrived.

"Just in, Mr. Compton," answered the night clerk, who knew him as Gaffey & Co's, "right-bower," and Mark at once proceeded to the accustomed landing of the particular packet. Straight to the office of the clerk of the Condor he made his way, after obtaining a foothold on the boat, and was soon looking over the bills of At that moment the boat's clerk en-
